DES MOINES, Iowa, January 12 .-This city has recently been witnessing fections of commission government. The commissioners have been squab-The commissioners have been squab-bling and bickering among themselves, opposing one another's projects, getting their personal amoitions between the spokes of the wheels of government. The story of Des Moines for the last eight years is the story of the rise, and to some extent of the fall, of civic righteousness. It shows most clearly how commission government will work —and how it may stop working. Above all, it proves that unless the average citizen keeps one eye on his municipal interests they are apt to get away from him.

Undoubtedly, one of the chief reasons for the success of commission government is that the campaign for the reform attracts public attention to public business. How to keep that public attention awake is a problem that many of the reform cities will have to face in the future. Des Moines, which adopted commission government in 1997, may be said to have faced it already, and therein lies the importance of her story.

Before the change conditions in this city were picturesquely bad. Ward politics, which are the pettiest politics on earth, had the city by the neck. The present commission occasionally quarrels, but in those good old days council meetings used occasionally to end in fist fights. Graft was openly charged, and its existence commonly believed. A mayor upon leaving office boasted of the money he had received from contractors. The quality of the city officials is indicated by the fact that one retiring mayor went to work as a barkeeper, while another one drove a dirt wagon shortly after his term expired.

The citizens finally awoke to the fact that they were not getting anything for their taxes, and a commission government was instituted. There was an instantaneous change from black to white. The new commission was on the Job early and late. Big city improvements were launched and completed. Party and ward politics were eliminated by the non-partisan ballot. The city administration in every respect was almost incredibly good.

The people of Des Moines were as pleased with their commission government as Their Commission. They liked to try it and see it work. A man who had try it and see it work. A man who had been trying in vain to get an abandoned telephone pole removed from his parking called up the commission and had the pleasure of seeing the pole hauled away the same day. Little things such as this, and big things, such as paving and playgrounds, gave the people complete faith in their commission. They concluded that they could forget all about the town and let the commission run it.

mission. They concluded that they could forget all about the town and let the commission run it.

Once you get the habit of politics it is very hard to quit. When the first Des Moines commissioners, who were hard-working business men, had done their turn of public service, some of them were glad to retire. And every time a good man retired, a hungry politician was glad to take his place. The people of Des Moines more or less suddenly awakened to the fact that they had the wolf of politics in the sheep's clothing of commission government.

It is not meant to imply, however, that commission government has been a failure in Des Moines. No charge of dishonesty or corruption has been made against any of the commissioners, but all of them are charged with playing personal politics instead of attending to the city's business. Two of the present commissioners are described as old politicians. A third is a labor union representative. The fourth is a contractor, and the only candidate on the business men's ticket who was succontractor, and the ency candidate on the business men's ticket who was suc-cessful at the last election. The mayor-commissioner is a former college pro-commissioner is a former college pro-fessor.

This commission is said to be divided by petty jealousies and misunderstand-ings. It has brought adverse criticism upon itself and commission government, whereas five years ago Des Moines was back of its commission to a man.

Even under these circumstances, hown government

The record of achievement in municipal progress since the commission form was adopted—much of it lapping over into the present, turbulent times—has been equaled by few cities. The gas rate has been reduced from $1 to $90 cents, and the gas company has just been compelled to pay back to consumers $114,000 improperly collected after the commission fixed the rate schedule. The company fought the case with might and main, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars and going to the Supreme Court of the United States. The city defended it and won it at a total expense of $23,000, exelusive of the regular salaries of the corporation counsel and his assistants. A civic center has been established on both sides ofthe Des Moines river, that flows through the center of the town. Here the commission has built a handsome city hall, costing $428,000. It has built four steel and concrete bridges at an expense of more than half a million, and has put up retaining walls and parked the river banks at a cost of $120,000.

the commission form of government was adopted.

An indirect but valuable result of the commission form of government in Des Moines is said to be the development of civic spirit for the improvement of private property. The commission plan was fostered, the commission charter was written and the campaign for its adoption was conducted by a committee representing the business interests and property owners of the city. So much was accomplished in public improvements that owners of private property were spurred by pride to improve. Whatever the motive, it is apparent to the visitor that there has been great activity of this character in the last few years, to the general advantage of the city. So, despite its upe and down, commission government has brought much benefit to Des

UNCLE SAM, ESQ.

Presidents as Commanders of Army and Navy.

By Oliver Owen Kuhn.

One of the anomalies of the American government is the fact that civilian Presidents of the United States are exofficio commander-in-chief of the army and navy and as such outrank the highest generals and admirals, men who learned their trade in the national academies and in actual practice. Statesmen in and out of Congress have often pointed out the dangers that might arise should the country become involved in a war during the incumbency of a civilian chief executive possessed of an overmastering will and the inclination to set his opinion and judgment against that of the trained military in actual charge of the nation's armies and navy. But the Constitution of the United States expressly confers this power and authority on the President, whoever he may be; though it is to be said that no President has ever yet taken personal charge of military operations during a war, although history shows how President Lincoln. Ilstening to the urgent advice of other civilians added to the clamorings of disgrunted military men, made frequent changes among the generals commanding the armies of the north during the civil war. the inclination to set his opinion and ditions, blockades or military campaigns on his own initiative, depending on the never yet withheld approval of Congress after the fact. He may not, however, formally declare war on any nation; this is a function of the Congress. War may actually exist; it may have existed for weeks, in fact, before the Congress by formal declaration acknowledges whateverybody and all the world has long known. Our war with Spain had been in progress for nearly two months, volunteers had been called for and had responded by the thousand, and war measures had been set on foot, before the Congress by formal action had promulgated the nation's declaration of war.

One of the bugaboos that have been used in the attempt to frighten the Congress after the fact. He may not,

One of the bugaboos that have been used in the attempt to frighten the people of the United States at one time or another has been the one of the "Man on Horseback"—that is, a President of commanding personality, dominating will and unscrupulous purpose, who might use his power as commander-in-chief of the army and navy to set up a military political machine, the purpose of which would be the perpetuation in office of such President. Mexico has often been cited as a horrible example of what a strong-willed and unscrupulous chief executive might do, backed by the army and navy. Porfirio backed by the army and navy. Porfiri-Diaz maintained his hold on the presi dency of the southern republic wholly by reason of his headship of the army and the Mexican rurales.

Has Escaped Calamity.

The United States, however, has had many Presidents since the day of George Washington-"many men of many minds"-but so far the country has escaped the calamity that might befall should any man elected to the befall should any man elected to the presidency choose actually to assume the powers and authority conferred to him by the Constitution as commander-in-chief of the nation's forces on land and sea.

"Commander-in-chief" as a military title for the President in times of peace, however, is more or less of a misnomer. The President may not remove even a second lieutenant, much less an officer of high rank, without action by a properly constited military tribunal. Notwithstanding the title of commander-in-chief, in peace times, the veriest "shave-tail," as the young-ster, just out of West Point is called in the army, possesses more actual military authority than does the President of the United States. Power and authority actually are lodged in the general board of the army—the navy having a similar board—which decides promotions, theoretically in the order of seniority, but often in practice in times past, by reason of influence; and the President merely promulgates the nominations and promotions decided upon by the board.

Boards Are Overridden.

Once in a wille, however, a President has taken seriously his more or less honorary title of commander-in-chief, has overridden the wishes of the general staff, the various boards and the

Could Command Directly.

The President, it will be noted, may do all of these things in time of war if Assessment Rolls. Schools. Two direct command of the land and sea pole golf courses are maintained under hole golf courses are maintained under the park system. It was discovered that valuable property in the business section was underassessed, and the commission employed experts to fix values scientifically, with the result that $27,000,000 of taxable value was added to the assessment rolls, thereby enabling the commission to reduce the city tax levy from an average of thirty-nine mills to thirty-two mills.

Motorization of fire departments is receiving attention in all cities of any size. In Des Moines the apparatus was changed in one year from horse-drawn to motor-driven at a cost of $110,000. Miles of good street paving have been laid, the public lighting has been vastly extended and one-half the swer system of the city has been put in since the commission form of government was adopted.

An indirect command of the land and sea forces of the country, relegating gengerals to the background and conducting can be recalled, however, that even the late President McKiniey, himself a veteran of the civil war, refrained from taking such action in the conflict with Spain, allowing the actual conduct of military operations to remain in the hands of mother constitutionally delegated powers where the president has ever yet assumed or endeavored to assume the full powers conferred on the chief executive as commander-in-chief of the army and navy.
